SILAGE GOOD WAY TO PRESERVE FORAGE

(Editor's note: This is the second of a series of articles on forage harvesting and feeding, a timely topic on Virginia dairy farms).

Silage may be the answer to the problem of forage preservation on your farm.

Dr. W. A. Hardison, dairy scientist at VPI, says making silage from the hay crop has many advantages. It is a good way to handle heavy, first-cutting crops that are ready to harvest during unfavorable hay-curing weather. At least as compared to making hay under field-curing conditions, making silage offers a way to preserve feed nutrients more efficiently. Furthermore, silage is palatable and high in feeding value.

Dr. Hardison backs up his belief with some reports of research done in several states. In tests designed to study the relative merits of different methods of harvesting and preserving alfalfa forage for dairy, feed it was found that leaf loss averaged 47.5% for field-cured hay (varying from 38.3% when none of the hay was wet, to 74.8% for hay wet by three showers), 28.2% for barn-dried hay, and 17.8% for wilted silage. On an average, the leaf loss for the field-cured hay was 1.7 times as much as that for barn-dried hay, and 2.7 times as much as that for wilted silage.

In these studies dry matter losses were larger in the field than during storage for all methods of preservation except ensiling. With silage, the losses during storage were higher than those in the field. Total dry matter losses ranged from 15% for hay barn-dried with heat to 36.6% for weathered field-cured hay. About 17% of the dry matter was lost when the forage was stored as wilted silage.

More total digestible nutrients, digestible protein, and carotene were preserved for feeding in wilted silage than in either field-cured oooioioi iolioioioi eee aaioioli aioi or barn-dried hay. The silage also was lowest in crude fiber.

Overall changes in composition and quality from cutting to feeding were smallest for silage and increasingly greater for barn - dried hay (heat), barn-dried hay (no heat), field-cured hay (no rain), field-cured hay (light rain), and field-cured hay (heavy rain).

When the forages were fed it was found that the wilted silage was more palatable than any of the other forages. Hays that were barn dried with and without heat and hays that were field-cured without rain damage were all about equally palatable, but slightly less palatable than silage. Field-cured hay damaged by rain was the least palatable.

The different forages were all found to be of about equal value for milk production on an equal dry matter basis (along with corn silage and grain), except the badly rain-damaged field-cured hay which was of lower value.

More nutrients were preserved by making silage or barn-drying the hay crops than by field curing, even when weather conditions were favorable for field curing.

DOCTOR TALK

By Benjamin B .Blackmon, M. D.

Infectious mononucleosis, or "glandular fever," has become a fairly commonly encountered disease among children and young adults. The groups most frequently affected of all are those in high school and college.

The actual cause of this disease process is not definitely known; however, all experimental evidence leads us to believe it results from a virus infection.

It apparently is not a highly contagious infection, and does not have epidemic qualities. The mode of transmission is thought to be from direct contact.

The usual picture is very similar to that seen in an acute viral infection. There is a characteristic period of onset, accompanied by sore throat, nasal stuffiness, coughing, headache, and the general complaints of influenza. One of the characteristic features with this disease is generalized enlargement of the lymph glands, particularly with those in the back of the neck. This is one of the features which leads a Doctor to suspect the possibility of this disease, when seeing a variety and number of cases of flu or disease of viral origin.

Probably the most important reason for recognizing glandular fever early is that the treatment, although very simple, is at the same time extremely singular. Absolute and strict bed rest is mandatory, and is required usually from three to six weeks, depending on the individual involvement. This factor is not generally recognized, and its importance cannot be over-emphasized. Many times sub-clinical or unrecognized acute phases of this disease occur, followed by a disguised remission for a period of time. In these cases there is later a gradual loss of energy, sluggishness and headaches, and other symptoms of general malaise, and possibly a low-grade fever. These unfortunate individuals are more resistant to a prompt recovery once the sub-acute or chronic process has developed.

This disease is not a really serious or fatal disease. However, it can be extremely debilitating, especially when it occurs in an extreme active and vital group of individuals. When adequate bed rest is enforced, with early recognition of its presence, there is usually no particular complication, and after a variable period of guarded activity the youngster may return to a completely normal and active existence.

How Much Corn This Year?

Your corn yield will be in direct proportion to number of stalks per acre and fertilizer—and, of course, water.

In most cases the farmer cannot control water but he does control population and fertility practices.

Mid-season varieties such as VPI 618, VPI 646, Fink G134, and Pioneer 301A should be planted at rate of 14-16,000 plants per acre and receive 600 to 800 lbs. of 10-10-10 or equivalent.

Soil insecticide demonstrations in Appomattox County last year pointed out that if soil insects are a problem, a 15-20% increase in stand can be obtained from using either aldrin or heptachlor in the soil.

These are available in the fertilizer at a cost of approximately $5.00 per acre. Three extra bushels and it's paid for.
